Local governments have to work with native populations and their dogs; the local environment is the dog owners responsibility. Dogs behave pretty much like their owners. Dogs are dogs. They will act and react to their owners, both good and bad. Since I am only a few kilometers away from the nearest town, the dog owners have a responsibility to keep their dogs in check. There are many good ways to do this and many bad ways. The bad ways are often the most convenient and quick to do. I know that from personal experience. But I also know that the problems and dangers associated with dogs in this area can be minimized by raising good dogs that are well socialized. Often I know someone and we have a mutual interest in dogs and dog training. One of my clients is a dog lover and a previous owner of two large black Labs. We had a hard time when the dogs became adults and started to become territorial and protective over their territory. The owners never did anything about it and were afraid to discipline or take away the dogs from the yard. Now, in my younger days, I would have already have a "punishment-based" approach. But dogs are not machines. They are emotional beings and are complex. As much as I would like to think that I am teaching them by showing them what I do, it is not that simple. All that I do is only the tip of the iceberg. What I do is generally what I did with my own dogs. And I have now taught many, many people and dog owners. I can say for certain that if you do what I do with your own dog, you will be successful. There is no substitute. There are ways to improve the situation by use of milder forms of punishment, like scolding, annoying, distracting, or just finding another place for the dog to do what he wants. Also, the owner must learn what is acceptable and unacceptable behavior for the dog. Bad behavior is usually a result of either social problems, the lack of socialization, or trauma. You cannot change a dog that has been abused or one with
