Forget about musical chairs at the New York Stock Exchange, as long as the Super Bowl isn't taking place on Wall Street, you're probably going to be pretty much safe. The NYSE was an exciting place for trading back in the day, but things have changed a lot since the legendary first-ever super-bowl of 1967. Trading on the exchange has declined for years, and it's actually fallen further since the market crash of 2008. Only a select few brokers are still allowed to work in the NYSE and that list is shrinking every year. When the game was played on Wall Street in 2000, the New York Stock Exchange traded more than 2 million shares of stock. In the first half of 2016, the exchange traded only 145,000 shares of stock. The NYSE has fallen to the level of a minor player in the investing world. That may be a good thing for investors and traders, but Wall Street has its own rules, and one of those rules is that trading has to be done on an exchange. The New York Stock Exchange and the Nasdaq exchange are the two big stock exchanges in the U.S. The NYSE is the bigger of the two. The exchange is split up into a number of divisions and can be roughly divided into two halves. The two halves of the exchange are the American Stock Exchange (AMEX) and

Tcpcap (Tcp:Trace:dump) is a packet sniffer which can display the contents of packets on the network. You can capture traffic on a local network segment or a wide area network and save it to a file. Tcpcap is an alternative to wireshark. A tcpcap is used to capture network traffic, however tcpcap is easier to use than wireshark as it will display the contents of the packets on the local area network. The program does not capture traffic. In the Linux operating system, tcpcap is provided by the packet-tools package, while in Windows, the 2d92ce491b
